- SBA Issues Much-Anticipated Guidance Regarding Changes of Ownership in PPP Loans

Unforgiven Paycheck Protection Program (PPP) loans have created a great deal of consternation for PPP borrowers looking to engage in merger and acquisition (M&A) transactions, as well as other asset sale, equity and restructuring transactions that could trigger a "change in ownership." A default typically would arise under most PPP loan documents if one of these types of transactions occurs. For example, the standard U.S. Small Business Administration (SBA) note form from the SBA 7(a) program, which many lenders used for their PPP programs, includes a default if the borrower "reorganizes, merges, consolidates, or otherwise changes ownership or business structure without Lender's prior written consent." It is therefore of considerable relief for many program participants that the SBA on Oct. 2, 2020, released a Procedural Notice to all SBA employees and PPP lenders that addresses the consent issue for M&A transactions that the market has been struggling with in recent months. PPP loans have been lifelines to many businesses, and now the next part of such a success story may involve some form of a change in ownership.

During the pandemic, business interruption lawsuits have increased, and some insurance companies have included arbitration clauses in contracts with policy holders to handle these disputes. However, determining whether those clauses are enforceable requires analysis of the intersection of state law, federal law and, where applicable, the New York Convention. Mr. Briz's article describes each of these three areas.
